

The Face of Fillmore

I remember in years past, listening faithfully to “The Rest of the Story” on the radio hosted by Paul Harvey. This week’s Face of Fillmore is going to do just that – tell a little of the rest of a story read a few weeks ago, as well as revisiting an older one.

In the article about raising sugar cane on the block where the First Ward Chapel stood and now the Mt. Catherine Manor is located there was a picture with a mystery man in it. Readers were asked to help identify him.

The prize for the identification goes to Drew Rasmussen. In reality, there were probably several readers who knew his identity, since he left a large posterity. The man in the tie whose name was missing is none other than the Stake President at that time – Andrew Brown.

President Brown was born in Scipio in 1899. He married his wife Nona Hatton from Fillmore in 1925 in Salt Lake City. He lived with his wife and children at 150 West 200 North, where Leslie and Elaine Rowley now make their home. He died in 1992, nearly reaching the century mark.

In another column a few years back, there was a Face of Fillmore about the BLM and the buildings that have housed its offices. I have run across a picture of the Day Hotel which was an important part of the column, but was missing a picture. It was located on the northwest corner of Main Street and Center Street. I have no idea who the man in the picture is. Maybe this is another person who needs identifying.
